Abstract

Some in-service deterioration in any mechanical device, such as an aircraft's gas-turbine engine, is inevitable. However, its extent and rate depend upon the qualities of design and manufacture, as well as on the maintenance/repair practices followed by the users. As a result of experiencing deterioration (of the engine as a whole or any of its components individually), an engine will seek a different steady operating point relative to that for an engine with no deterioration. This results in changes in the available thrust from the engine(s) at the same TETs and/or rotational-speeds. Any reduction in the available thrust at specified engine settings, especially maximum available thrust from the engines, will have a significant adverse effect upon the aircraft's operational-performance. These adverse effects can be reduced by having a better knowledge of the effects of each such deterioration on the aircraft's operational-performance. Subsequently improvements can be made in the design and manufacture of adversely-affected components as well as in maintenance and repair

Highlights

- The incidence rate of silent myocardial infarction (MI) to all MIs was 25%.
- The incidence rate of silent MI was 1.44 per 1000 patient-years.
- These are the first data in diabetic patients without previous atherosclerotic events.
- The data were from a 10.3 year-follow-up cohort study.

Abstract

Background

Silent events with newly developed Q waves in electrocardiogram (ECG) [silent myocardial infarction (MI)] in diabetic patients is reported to be independently associated with an increased risk of fatal MI. However, the incidence rate of silent MI in diabetic patients has yet to be clarified. We sought to determine the incidence rate of first symptomatic MI and silent MI in diabetic patients.

Methods

We conducted a prospective cohort study on patients enrolled in the Japanese primary
